Submission: Defences ability to waste money on projects.

Currently Defence has a number a project in the pipeline, as an example one of which is the Airbus air refuelling project and the Boeings AWACS project why did we buy and I say buy because we have bought these planes from two different companies when if we had used a bit of for thought and tried to negotiate one contract with one company to build these planes with two different payloads, is DMO trying to waste money? That means two suppliers twice the amount of time cataloguing items and no way that either part can be used in either plane, it seems a monumental waste of money. Along with that it also means two separate projects are running concurrently paying people to do the same thing with two companies when one would have been more than sufficient, after the tender process had been accepted.
